Secondary research indicates that while vouchers look good on paper, they do not desegregate inner city schools, provide educational opportunity, or promote viable educational choices. This research was completed for the purpose of determining what voucher systems actually are, how vouchers are supposed to operate, and why vouchers fall short of their intended use. This research was conducted by studying and analyzing several competent texts authored by educational reformers. Preliminary research on this topic also yields insight into the lack of motivation by some private schools to become involved with a voucher system of any kind as well as their unwillingness to meet accountability standards set up by public education institutions.
